X.

X is not used in the Italian language. The x found in Latin words is translated by a double s, as Alessandro for Alexander, and sometimes with a single one, as esempio, for exemplum; some old authors use the x, but merely for the purpose of avoiding an equivocate, as in the word Xanto, a Greek river, which, if it were written with an s, would equivocate with Santo, a saint. In such a case others use a z and write Zanto. X denotes the number ten.

Y

The Greek vowel letter y is excluded from the Italian alphabet, its place being always supplied by i.

Z.

Z, s. f. the last letter of the Italian alphabet and the seventeenth of the consonants. Substantives beginning with a z, are preceded by the article lo for the singular, and gli for the plural. Dall'A sino alla Z, from the beginning to the end. This letter has two sounds: the one sharp and harsh like ts, as in pazzo, mezzo; the other mild and soft, as in zelo, zio.
